Fund manager Comment

Highlights

- In November 2024, the high yield bond market produced a gain. Credit spreads compressed, and rates fell, resulting in outperformance by CCC-rated credits relative to their higher-rated peers. The Media and Energy sectors outperformed while the Utility and Technology & Electronics sectors lagged
- The Fund returned 0.8%, lagging the Bloomberg U.S. Corporate High Yield Bond Index by 0.3%. Such underperformance was driven primarily by security selection among B3-rated and Caa2-rated holdings, as well as cash drag
- Markets remain volatile as elevated concerns shifted from inflation to the labor market. Higher interest rates are a headwind for economic growth, although U.S. Treasury yields reversed course during the month heading lower in November

Cumulative performance	Fund	Index
1M	0.5%	0.8%
YTD	2.2%	4.6%

Market Review

In November 2024, the high yield bond market, as represented by the ICE BofA US High Yield Index, gained 1.15%. The primary drivers of this positive performance were declining interest rates and spread compression. Performance by quality shows CCC-rated bonds (1.63%) outperformed B-rated bonds (1.11%), which in turn outperformed BB-rated bonds (1.05%). All sectors generated gains, with the Media (2.03%) and Energy (1.51%) sectors performing best, while Technology & Electronics (-1.08%) and Utility (-1.00%) sectors were the biggest laggards.

Fund Review

The Fund returned 0.8% in November 2024, but lagged the Bloomberg U.S. Corporate High Yield Bond Index by -0.3%. The duration effect was slightly negative and offset the positive income effect. The quality allocation effect was positive. The overall quality security selection effect was negative and driven by the Fund's bond holdings rated Caa2 and B3, which lagged those of the index. From a sector perspective, the overall security selection effect was negative. The Fund's bond holdings in the Consumer Cyclical sector lagged those of the benchmark and detracted the most from relative performance. Lastly, cash drag negatively effected relative performance.

Outlook

Given Polen Credit's expectation that economic activity will face pressure from elevated rates, geopolitical risks, and tighter monetary policy, Polen Credit believes that security selection will remain paramount in achieving outperformance over the coming quarters. A prolonged conflict in Ukraine as well as burgeoning risks of further escalation in the Middle East, add to concerns around a monetary policy mistake by the Fed. The significant shift to tighter monetary policy since the end of 2021, appears to be having a lag effect on the U.S. economy, which may be manifesting in a softening labor market. With that noted, Polen Credit believes that valuations in the current high yield market are attractive, particularly across certain issuers that appear better positioned to weather a prolonged economic downturn.
